Dr. Dacher Keltner from the UC Berkeley Department of Psychology and Dr. Matthew Hertenstein (now at DePauw University) have conducted extensive research on how touch communicates emotions. In their 2006 paper Touch Communicates Distinct Emotion, Keltner and Hertenstein investigated the ability of touch to convey various emotions. Given the importance of cooperation and altruism in social groups, Keltner and his colleagues hypothesized that it should be possible to communicate prosocial ...

There is a direct correlation between touch and our emotions. Through touch, we bond with others, we gain warm feelings, and build a sense of trust. The power of holding someones hand, the message in a hug, the feeling of being caressed, the significance of a pat on the back, the meaning of a kiss, and the myriad of ways we make human contact are the basics of communication.
